[From the New York Tribune.] HUNGARY.

HER POSITION, RESOURCES, &C.

For more than a century the kingdom of Hungary, although enjoying a separate legislation, retaining, in fact, her own ancient system of laws, and recognising only the sovereignty of the house of Hapsburg, has, in a great measure, merged her nationality in that of the Austrian Empire. She has thus lost her place, as a nation, in the chronicles of the modern historian; the character of her people, her position, and her social and commercial relations are no longer familiar to the memories of the present generation. Since the commencement of the European revolution, however, her situation is different. Leading the victorious vanguard of the armies of Republicanism, she fights with the eyes of the world upon her, holding the hopes of other races, the fate of other struggles, dependent upon her own. While she continues to keep at bay the wast forces pressing upon her frontiers, let us take a brief glance at her position, and the resources she can command to meet the coming necessity.

The geographical extent of Hungary, including the ancient dependencies of Transylvania and Croatia, and that collection of different tribes organized under a peculiar system as a military frontier between her dominions and Turkey, more than equals For more than a century the kingdom of Hun atia, and that collection of different tribes organized under a peculiar system as a military frontier between her dominions and Turkey, more than equals that of Auswia with all her remaining provinces of Bohemia, Gallicia, Tyrol, Lombardy, and Venice. The traveller who approaches Vienna from the north, sees at one glance from the sloping heights which conduct him to the Danube the imperial city at his feet, the spires of Hungarian Presburg on the horizon, and the outposts of the Carpathian range far away to the northeast. From the river March—the Austrian frontier north of the Danube—a day's forced march would take an army to the walls of Vienna. The boundary line extends nearly to Cracow on the north, following the course of the Carpathians as they curve eastward like a grand natural arch, resisting the pressure of Russia. South of the Danube, it runs to the southwest in an irregular line, closely approaching the great sia. South of the Danube, it runs to the southwest in an irregular line, closely approaching the great highway from Vienna to Trieste, and striking the Adriatic at the head of the gulf of Fiume. The Danube, sweeping to the east for about seventy miles after leaving Presburg, turns abruptly to the south at Waitzen, (the scene of a late glorious Hungarian victory,) and, parting the rival cities of Pesth and Ofen, passes through the heart of the kingdom. At the fortress of Peterwaradin—which is to the Danube what Ehrenbreitstein is to the Rhine—it again resumes its easterly course.

of Pesth and Ofen, passes through the heart of the kingdom. At the fortress of Peterwaradin—which is to the Danube what Ehrenbreitstein is to the Rhin—it again resumes its easterly course, striking the Turkish frontier at Belgrade, and skirting Transylvania till within a hundred miles of the Black Sea.

The central region of Hungary, stretching out from the Carpathians to the Danube in vast steppes which are drained by the Theiss and its myriad tributaries, is not surpassed in soil and climate by any other part of Europe. It yields, in great abundance, all the products of the temperate zone, with others common to Italy and Southern France. The harvests of grain are abundant and certain. The plains are protected from the cold winds of the North by a mountain range 8,000 feet in height, while the hot blasts of the South are tempered before they reach the Danube, in the deflies of the Balkan and the immeasurable forests of Servia. Hungary thus produces within her own borders, even under the imperfect system of agriculture which her peasants have practised for three hundred years, all that is necessary to her own sustenance. The valleys of the Carpathians support numberless flocks of sheep, goats, and cattle; the central table land, watered by six hundred streams, brings forth, with little labor, wheat, rye, maize, barley, and all kinds of vegetables; the warm hills bordering the Danube yield annually twenty-five million gallons of wine, among them the renowned Tokay; while the marshes in some of the south of the central table land, watered by six hundred streams, brings forth, with little labor, wheat, rye, maize, barley, and all kinds of vegetables; the warm hills bordering the Danube yield annually twenty-five million gallons of wine, among them the renowned Tokay; while the marshes in some of the south of the central table land, watered by six hundred to teach the products of the termination had been received of the Russians and this country—the products of the including the products of the termination had been

The Carpathian district, inhabited by that branch of the Sclavonic race known as the Slowaks, and some Germans who are connected with the mining operations, is rich in the precious as well as the ruder and more necessary metals. Gold is as abundant in some localities as in the mines of the Ural, whence Russia draws her fabulous wealth; veins of silver and copper of unusual richness are frequently met with, and the wandering lapidary picks up in the untravelled recesses of the mountains the emerald, the jacinth, and the radiant opal. own. They received the name of Ungri from the Sclavonic tribes whom, in the tenth century, they dispossessed of the fertile plains of the Danube. This title was taken up by the Germans, and under it they became famous as a nation. The Magyars, who number about 4,800,000 souls, still inhabit the generous soil which attracted them from the East, and one of their cities, Debreczin, is now the temporary capital of Hungary.

The Sclavonic tribes hold all the mountainous districts, and are estimated collectively at 4,500,000, divided between Croatia on the south, embracing the sea-port of Fiume, the Slowaks among the Car-divided between Croatia on the south, embracing the sea-port of Fiume, the Slowaks among the Carpathians, and the Szeklers, Bulgarians, Servians and other small groups on the military frontier. The Germans, 1,250,000 in all, inhabit the rich wooded and hilly province of Transylvania, east of the Carpathians, whither they emigrated in the twelfth century, and where they still preserve the language and customs of the Rhine, surrounded on all sides by the Magyar and Sclavonic races. No country in the world holds within an uninterrupted boundary, and under a single civil system, so many striking contrasts of language and blood.

The same causes which have operated to prevent the advance of the Hungarians in all modern arts, have also contributed to preserve, in spite of arts, have also contributed to preserve, in spite of persecution and intrigue, the ancient balance of sects, in a religious view. The Magyars embraced Christianity soon after their settlement on the Danube, and for centuries kept the tide of Turkish invasion from flowing upon Western Europe. At the time of the Reformation the greater part of them went over to the Projestants, in connection with the Germans of Transylvania and some of the Sclavonic tribes. The proportion now stands: Protestants five and a ham millions, Catholics nearly five millions, and members of the Greek Church about two millions. The unjust persecution of the Protestants by the power at Vienna is among the wrongs which Hungary is now so valiantly avenging.

We have said that Hungary is still in the beginning of her development. Her peasants were but yesterday released from the feudal tenure of a barbarous age. The natural richness of her soil was sufficient for their wants as serfa, but the stimulus of freedom will place agriculture at once upon a higher and more valuable footing. The veins of the Carpathians are still swelling to depletion with their mineral treasures, which the railroads of Central Europe and the vessels of the Danube and Mediterranean stand ready to take to a hundred markets. In spite of the arbitrary and burdensome Austrian customs, and the Imperial monopoly of salt and tobacco, which Hungary produces in great abundance, her yearly revenue from her trade with Germany amounts to nearly six millions of florins. Should she secure her release from Austrian domination, and, as an independent State, adopt those wise and liberal measures of encouragement and protection which her present leader, Kossuth, has so zealously advocated, we shall soon see her attain a commercial importance second to that of no nation of Southern or Central Europe. May the vital patriotic spirit which aswanimates her roused population, succeed in fulfilling the progress of which it is a cheering prophecy!

We shall take another occasion to speak of the present political relations of Austria and Hungary.

MISCELLANIES FROM PUNCH.

Mr. Lovelace on marriage.—"Why, yes, ma'am," says Lovelace, beginning to coax the tip of his nose—as he's a habit—with his right thamb and two first fingers—"Yes, ma'am, Pve been on daty—and I may say the duty was a pleasure. I have been, Miss Benimble, to Hanover square."

Whereupon my woman's heart beat with a bounce, and sent the words to my mouth. "I see it," says I. "You've been to St. George's church, and the world's no better than a cinder heap—Jenny Lind is married. The nightingale has put her neck in the wedding-ring, and we may all go into short mourning."

"It's very odd," says Lovelace. "But my 'pinion is that the third thought of every woman is, always going to the altar. It's a crotchet of mine, that every female baby comes into the world with the whole marriage service ready printed in its little head, besides all the figures of the quadrilles, the fashions of the month, the—"

"Nonsense!" says I. "And suppose it was so, what then? Marriage is nothing to you creatures. But what a weight it is upon us! You may laugh, Mr. Lovelace: I'm sure of it. Hymen makes fetters of adamant—if I may be allowed the wordfor we women: while, for you men, they're nothing more than a chain of buttercups and daisies. For it doesn't hold you,—and you know it doesn't."

"Can't say," said Lovelace, surring his tea, "I've never yet been married."

Shameful misreporting.—What Tongue said in the House. Seeing the noble lord in his place, which I am very glad, and indeed I might say the country expects it at such a moment, I beg to ask the noble lord what the Government intends to do: that is, whether they intend to do any thing.—I mean the Government, not the Russians—and has any communication taken place between Russia and this country—that is, upon this subject, which is a most important subject to the peace of Europe, and is the subject of much anxiety. I trust the noble lord will give a plain answer to a plain question.

Louis Napoleon—I won't say that he "Who drives fat oxen should himself be fat,"
But a republic's president should be Republican himself—I will say that.
When Rome shook off her priestly yoke,
What right had you to put your spoke,
I beg to ask you, in her common weal?
What ground had you for interference,
When of the pope she made a clearance?
Pray, who call'd you with her affairs to deal?
The Romans may be right or wrong,
I don't care which, in turning Pius out,
And sending all the cardinals along
With that good pontiff to the right about;
But let them choose their form of government,
And what's the odds, so long as they're content?
Are you to cram down their refuctant gullets,

Are you to cram down their reluctant guillets, Are you to cram down their reductant guilets,
The kind of constitution you think best,
By means of swords, and bayonets, and bullets?
Against such tyranny I must protest.
I really wonder you've the cheek
To talk about your republique.
In dignity you merit an advance;
There is a post which you are fitter far
To fill than to be president of France;
Instead of that you ought to be the Czar.
The Roman people to coerce and menace,
You send your howitzers and bombs,
With Oudinot to play the modern Brennus—
What of this intervention comes?
Disgrace, defeat—in point of fact,
Your troops got regularly whack'd.
How could they stand against a fee that sung

How could they stand against a fee that sung.

Of Rome possess the right, of course,
As perfectly as any others;
Also to dance and caper at their pleasures
Round trees of liberty in sportive measures;
In short, their own republic to enjoy,
So long as other folks they don't annoy.
All well for you, if France all acquiesce
Quietly in her own stultification;
If not, you've got yourself into a mess,
From which I sish you happy extrication.
